A French Detective.

We walked out together, and in the course of conversation we touched upon the way in which some persons can so disguise themselves as to hide their individuality from their most intimate friends. I expressed myself as being doubtful whether this could be really done, provided the parties to be deceived were on the lookout for such deception. My companion differed from me, and offered to disguise himself so effectually that he could, in the course of the next twenty-four hours, speak to me for at least ten minutes without exciting my suspicions.

I accepted the challenge, and staked the price of a dinner at any restaurant he would like to name. He agreed, and the very same day won the bet in the following manner: Shortly after leaving the detective I met an old friend, who asked me to dine with him at Versailles that evening. I agreed to do so, but could not leave Paris as early as my friend intended to do, and therefore told him I should go down by the half-past five train from the Gare St. Lazare. I did so, and as I got into a first-class carriage, I remarked a short, gentlemanly-looking man, with white hair, who followed me into the same compartment. Frenchman like, he began to talk about things in general, and we chatted together, more or less, nearly all the way to Versailles.

When within ten minutes' ride or so of our destination, my new friend quietly took off his hat, pulled off a wig, got rid of a mustache, and to my complete amazement sat revealed before me as my friend, the detective! How he had managed to find out that I was going to Versailles—which I had no idea of myself when I left him—or how he had so effectually concealed his appearance that I, sitting within three feet of him, had no idea that he was the man whom I had left some four hours previously, are problems I cannot solve. The detective himself only laughed when I asked him how he had contrived it. He was evidently greatly flattered at the amazement I displayed, but beyond showing me with some pride his wig and mustache, he was very reticent, and would enter into no details.

That he had fairly won the dinner there could be no doubt, but he said he would rather put off the event until he could see his way as to whether or not he should be able to recover a part or the whole of the property which my friend had lost. We then parted, he taking the train back to Paris, I going to the house where I was to dine.

An old tamer of wild beasts says: "As for the smell of blood maddening them, I know there is a popular notion to that effect, but it is not true. I have had occasion enough to know when it was my blood they smelt. Lions and tigers raised in captivity are more dangerous than those who are well broken when taken wild, full grown. When a cub born in a cage grows up, he will become impudent, saucy, aggressive, and is too familiar with men to be easily cowed. But the wild beast never forgets when he has once been well whipped, and though his instincts will still prompt him to attack, he will have his doubts about the result of his getting into a fight. You may handle a young lion for years, and it will be as harmless as a Newfoundland dog, until suddenly, without any apparent reason, all its ferocity will be developed."

A woman at Cape Girardeau, Mo., who had suffered from a husband's neglect, traced him to a bar-room where he was playing cards with several companions. Setting a covered dish she held in her hands down upon the table, she said, "Presuming, husband, you were too busy to come home to dinner, I have brought you yours," and departed. With a forced laugh he invited his friends to dine with him, but on removing the cover from the dish found only a slip of paper on which was written: "I hope you will enjoy your meal; it is the same your family have at home."
